NEW JERSEY — Some police officers in New Jersey are being quarantined after testing positive for new coronavirus, according to the New Jersey State Policeman's Benevolent Association.

“One is back to work already, some are quarantined, and some regretfully and unknowingly passed the virus to family members,” the union said in a statement. “Thankfully, all members and their families are stable. Please continue to keep all of them in your thoughts and prayers. Let’s all hope for a speedy recovery without any other issues.”

This week, the union began providing ShopRite gift cards to members who are either being quarantined or their family members of members who are hospitalized, according to the union.

“Virtually all Shop Rites deliver, and they are located throughout the state,” PBA President Pat Colligan said in the post. “Please contact your delegate immediately if you or another member are quarantined and we will get one to you as soon as possible. If you require assistance shopping or there is not a Shop Rite near you we will make the appropriate arrangements.”

A major issue impacting the state is the lack of personal protective equipment, Colligan said.

“In the short term, there is no easy fix,” Colligan said. “Every agency in the country is trying to order the exact same items. In the long term, be sure your respective agency is not only ordering those items for the next national emergency but that they monitor the stock for expiration.”

The New Jersey Department of Health has partnered with the New Jersey Poison Information and Education System to open and operate a call center (1-800-222-1222) for public use regarding questions, concerns, and other information related to coronavirus spread in New Jersey.
